

Unity: In an Age of Uncertainty

In these times, being together and united is harder than it has been before. Due to this pandemic, social distancing has caused being together, in social gatherings and get togethers practically banned, and we can't unite together physically enjoy each other's company. But being united is more than just physically being together. It's a bond, an emotional connection to everyone, facing the same difficulties in a difficult situation. So, even in this scenario, where we seem so far apart, we as a whole, as a community are closer than we've ever been, as we stand united to face a greater threat, that requires us all working together to beat this virus. It requires everyone playing their roles to stay safe. Unfortunately not everyone stands together. Though inside, we are all human, others still define people by their outside, color, race, ethnicity, religion, and even political stance. It's definitely a shame, as humanity could most certainly accomplish so much more if we all stood together, without prejudice. But as long as there are people with misguided ideals and opinions based purely on looks and stereotypes that stay firm to their beliefs, people will be influenced by others to make the wrong assumptions about people, and make bad choices. But it's never too late, people can always change for the better, in order to form a better world. When everyone works together, we can all learn people's worth, from their actual attitude, their personality, their soul. We can work together to teach each other to respect and honor each other's self worth. When we can do that, that's we can claim true unity, in an age of uncertainty. It requires a group effort, but if we can all listen, then we can really change our world to something better, happier, and healthier. We cause more good united than divided, so it all falls on us to follow through on correct morals, and become better.
